of simple and obvious meaning (such as camp-boy, camp-fire, camp-language), which are practically unlimited in number, and of which several thousands are recorded and illustrated by quotations, but without individual explanations, under the Main words.

The 29,295 words are thus made up:

	Main Words.	Special combinations.	Subordinate words.	Total.
	21,295	3,461	4,539	29,295
(including CH.	2,720	587	717	4,024)

Considered as to their status in the language, the Main words are divided approximately into those still current and fully native or naturalized, those now obsolete (marked †), and those which are alien or imperfectly naturalized (marked ||). The distribution of the Main words is

	Current.	Obsolete.	Alien	Total.
	15,852	4,515	928	21,295
(including CH.	2,084	494	142	2,720)

Thus, of the whole Main words included in C,  $21\frac{1}{2}\%$  are obsolete,  $4\frac{3}{8}\%$  alien or not fully naturalized.

If to these we add the words treated in Volume I, we have, for the contents of the first three letters of the alphabet, the following figures:

	Main Words.	Special combinations.	Subordinate words.	Total.
A, B, and C	43,527	7,753	9,269	60,549

Of the Main words there are

	Current.	Obsolete.	Alien.	Total.

That is, for the whole three letters,  $71\frac{3}{4}\%$  are now current and fully naturalized,  $24\frac{1}{8}\%$  are obsolete,  $4\frac{1}{8}\%$  alien or imperfectly naturalized; more than three-fourths of all the words included being thus in living use.

The plan and general features of the Dictionary have been already set forth in the Preface and Introduction to Vol. I. It need only be said here that C has presented, in its extent and variety, an ample field for the application of the principles there laid down. As a letter, it is a typical one, containing words of all kinds and from all sources, and it has perhaps more than an average proportion of words of particular historical interest. It comprises Old English words of Teutonic and Scandinavian origin, such as the verbs COME, CAST, and CALL, which are the subjects of some of the longest articles yet contained in the Dictionary; important words from Norman French, like CATTLE, COUNCIL, COUNTRY, COUNTY, and COURT; numerous words from Latin, directly or through French, like those in CON- and COUNTER- already mentioned, or more circuitously like CROSS, with its interesting history; many words from Greek, directly or through Latin, as CATHEDRAL, CHLORINE, CHOLERA, CLERGY, or more circuitously, like the great word CHURCH; from Celtic, as CAIRN, CRAG; from modern Romanic tongues, as CASTE, CHAGRIN, CHAMOIS, COCO, CORK, CRUSADE, CUPOLA; from other European languages, as CHACO, COACH, COSS, CRAVAT, CZAR; from Hebrew (ultimately), as CHERUB; from Arabic, as CARAVAN, COFFEE, COTTON; from Persian, as CHECK, CIESS; from Turkish, as CHOUSE; from various East Indian and other Oriental tongues, as CALICO, CAMPHOR, CASSOWARY, CASH, COMPOUND, CONGOU; from languages of America and the West Indies, as CACAO, CANOE, CAOUTCHOUC, CAUCUS.

To enumerate here even a tithe of the words of special interest would take too much space; to such, users of the Dictionary will themselves naturally turn. But attention may be called to the number of words connected with the history of CHRISTIANITY, and the CHURCH, including CANON, CATHEDRAL, CATHOLIC, CHANCEL, CHAPEL, CHAPTER, CHERUB, CHOIR, CLERGY, CLERK, COLLEGE, CONGREGATION, CONVENT, CONVENTICLE, COVENANT, CROSIER, CROSS, and many others; to those connected with civil and political history as CHARTIST, CHILTERN, CITY, COLONY, COMMON, COMPANY, COMMUNISM, CONGRESS, CONSERVATIVE, CONSTITUTION, CORONER, CORPORATION, COUNCIL, COUNTRY, COUNTY, and COURT; to other words of curious history as CATACOMB, CHOLERA, CLOSH, COCKATRICE, COCKNEY, COMPURGATION.

The Historical method followed has cleared the origin and history of hundreds of words from the errors in which conjectural 'etymology' had involved them; it has established the actual derivation of many, and has left the origin of others as unknown and, to all appearance, lost. It has established the recent origination of a considerable portion of our vocabulary, and shown to what an extent, especially in CL- and CR- words, onomatopœia has continued to work; and it has brought into prominence the remarkable extent to which, in our composite language, the same monosyllabic combination of three or four letters is apt to constitute several words entirely unconnected in origin, as exemplified under CLOCK, COB, COCK, COD, COG, COLL, COP, COPE, COT, CROCK. In the case of these homographic groups, when the history of some of the individual words is also uncertain, it is often exceedingly difficult to decide what are distinct words, and what are only senses of one and the same original word. In doubtful cases, I have usually leant to treating such as senses of one word, so as not unnecessarily to increase the number of homographs; but, in each case, attention is called to the possibility that senses so combined may really be in their origin distinct words. See, for example, the senses treated under COB sb.<sup>1</sup>, COP sb.<sup>2</sup>

A considerable portion of the materials for C (Ca—Cc, Ci—Comm) was formerly subedited by Mr. H. H. Gibbs, and part of the remainder by the late Mr. Geo. White of Marychurch, Torquay, in accordance with the original proposals of the Philological Society. While the present volume has been in preparation, successive portions of the letter have been subedited under the Editor's direction, with addition of all new materials, by a number of volunteer workers, viz., the Rev. C. B. Mount, M.A., Oxford, Mr. E. C. Hulme, of 18 Philbeach Gardens, South Kensington, Mr. G. L. Apperson, of 11 Park Road, Wimbledon, the late Mr. W. Noel Woods, B.A., of Elgin Road, Addiscombe, Surrey (assisted by Mrs. Woods, B.A.), the late Mr. John Peto, of Ravenswood, Alleyne Park, S.E., Mr. A. Hailstone, of 20 Woodland Road, Cheetham Hill, Manchester, Miss J. E. A. Brown, Further Barton, Cirencester, the Rev. W. B. Robertson Wilson, M.A., Dollar, and small portions by Mrs. G. Pope, the Avenue, Clifton, Miss Edith Thompson, Brokes Lodge, Reigate, and Mr. T. Henderson, M.A., Bedford. Of the amount of time devoted by these voluntary workers to the Dictionary, and their valued help in facilitating the final labours of the editorial staff in the Scriptorium, I speak with the highest appreciation and gratitude. Three of the number, I regret to record, have, during the progress of the volume, been removed by death: Mr. John Peto, at a good old age, and Mr. and Mrs. Woods in their early prime<sup>1</sup>.

In the 'proof' stage continuous help has been given by Mr. H. Hucks Gibbs, M.A., the Rev. J. B. Johnston, B.D., Falkirk, the Rev. J. T. Fowler, M.A., F.S.A., Vice-Principal of Bishop Hatfield's Hall, Durham, Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., Gosport, Monsieur F. J. Amours, of Glasgow, and above all by Mr. Fitzedward Hall, D.C.L., who has continued his daily collation and annotation of the proofs, and supplied, from the fruits of his life-long studies in English literature, thousands of quotations for the use of words at earlier or later dates than those already recorded, for rare words and senses, or interesting and curious idioms. Grateful acknowledgements are also due to Professor Eduard Sievers, now of Leipzig, and Monsieur Paul Meyer, Member of the Institute of France, for their continuous help with the etymology and history of difficult Teutonic and Romanic words respectively; as also to Professor F. Neumann of Heidelberg, Professor F. Kluge of Freiburg im Breisgau, Dr. W. H. Muller of Leyden, Dr. Axel Erdmann and Professor Noreen of Upsala, Professor Storm of Christiania, Professor O. Jespersen of Copenhagen, Señor Don Rufino Cuervo, author of a Spanish Etymological Dictionary, Professor J. Rhys, Mr. W. R. Morfill, M.A., Professor Margoliouth, M.A., Mr. J. T. Platts, M.A., and Rev. Dr. G. U. Pope, for very frequent help in tracing the etymology and history of words from French, German, Dutch, Norse, Celtic, Slavonic, Arabic, Persian, Hindustānī, Tamil, and other Oriental languages.

From most of the scholars and specialists already named in Vol. I, help has also been received in the present volume; to their names must be added those of Sir W. R. Anson, Bart., Warden of All Souls, the Rev. Andrew Clark, M.A., Mr. C. H. Firth, M.A., Prof. P. Gardner, M.A., Prof. Ray Lankester, F.R.S., Dr. R. L. Poole, all of Oxford, Mr. A. J. Hipkins (for names of Musical Instruments), and Mr. W. H. Stevenson, of the Record Office, London.

<sup>1</sup> The ranks of our voluntary workers have meanwhile been filled up by Mr. James Bartlett, M.A., Cloverlea, Bramley, Guildford, who has subedited G, and commenced work on R, the Rev. Canon R. Morris, D.D., Eaton, Eccleston, Cheshire, who has subedited part of I, and Mr. H. A. Nesbitt, of 7 Newburgh Road, Acton, who has done a portion of N.

The volume has been especially enriched by the assistance of Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., and Professor F. W. Maitland of Downing College, Cambridge, in words connected with legal antiquities, of Miss Edith Thompson in the investigation of words belonging to English History, of Mr. W. T. Thiselton Dyer, F.R.S., F.L.S., in the history of plant names and botanical terms, of Professor Alfred Newton of Magdalene College, Cambridge, in ornithological terms, of Professor Albert W. Chester of Hamilton College, Clinton, N.Y., in mineralogical terms, of Dr. W. Sykes, F.S.A., of Gosport, in the history of medical and pathological words, of Mr. Alexander Beazeley, C.E., in the history of architectural terms, of the Rev. Principal Fairbairn in the history of several theological terms, of the late Dr. E. Hatch, and the Rev. F. E. Warren, M.A., in some ecclesiastical and liturgical words, and of Mr. R. B. Prosser, formerly of the Patent Office, in the history of recent technical terms connected with arts and manufactures. Acknowledgement has also to be made of the kindness of Professor J. M. Dixon, late of the Imperial University, Tôkyô, Japan, now of the Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri, who presented to us the whole of the quotations collected for his valuable Dictionary of Idiomatic English Phrases, furnished with full references to the authors and works cited.

In some earlier parts of the letter, especially in C<sup>L</sup>-, C<sup>I</sup>-, I had the advantage of the collaboration of Mr. Henry Bradley, who has since edited the letter E, and is now occupied with F. The assistants in the Scriptorium who have co-operated with me in the production of the volume, and whose share in the work is recorded with warm appreciation, are Mr. John Mitchell, Mr. Walter Worrall, B.A., Mr. A. T. Maling, M.A., Mr. C. Balk, and (for part of the letter) Mr. A. Erlebach, B.A., Mr. G. Morrison, and Mr. F. J. Sweatman.

ADDITIONS AND EMENDATIONS.

Cent<sup>2</sup>. Etymology The Romanic origin is established: juego de los cientos, i.e. 'hundred-game' is the Spanish name of piquet. Cf. CIENTO.

Clead, cleed, v. Etymology. Omit the eighth line, and substitute 'f. klædz sb.: see CLOTH.'

Clever. What is perhaps an example of this word, of date 1470, and from Norfolk, where Sir T. Browne located it, occurs in the Paston Letters, No. 656 (II. 415), printed 'if it be soo that all thyng go olyver currant'; where 'clyver' is perhaps the reading of the (now lost) MS., cf. the dialectal uses under B.

Coincide, and its derivatives, are treated in a scholarly monograph by H. E. Shepherd, in the American Journal of Philology, vol. I. pp. 271-280, in which the history of the words in the mediæval Latin of Roger Bacon and the English writers of the 17 c. is traced with much fullness. For the verb, in sense 3, earlier instances are given from BERKELEY (1705) Works IV. 442, and W. WOLLASTON (1709) in Nichols Illustr. Lit. I. 201.

Corduroy (spelt corderoy) has now been found, by Mr. R. B. Prosser, a little earlier. Chadwick's Patent, No. 1093, of 1774, specifies inter alia, 'cotton corderoys, cotton and linen corderoys'.

Cowl sb.<sup>2</sup> Prof. Skeat points out the OE. form cufel, pl. cufas, of date 963-84, in Castul. Saxon. (ed. Birch) 367, 'ii cufas & þry trogas' [two cowls and three troughs]. This makes certain its relationship to OHG. chubil, whether originally Teutonic, or of West Germanic adoption from Latin.

C.

C (si), the third letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally identical with the Greek Gamma, Γ, and Semitic Gimel, whence it derived its form through the successive types Γ, ζ, C. The Greek Kappa, Κ, being from the first little used by the Romans, C functioned in earlier Latin both as (g) and (k); the latter sound being the more frequent came to be viewed as the more appropriate to C, and about 300-230 B.C., a modified character, Ċ or Q, was introduced for the (g) sound, and C itself retained for the (k) sound. Hence, in the classical period and after, Ċ was treated as the phonetic representative of Gamma, and C as the equivalent of Kappa, in the transliteration of Greek words into Roman spelling, as in ΚΑΔΜΟΣ, ΚΤΡΟΣ, ΦΩΚΙΣ, in Roman letters CADMVS, CYRVS, PHOCIS.

When the Roman alphabet was introduced into Britain, C had only the sound (k); and this value of the letter has been retained by all the insular Celts: in Welsh, Irish, Gaelic, C, c, is still only = (k). The Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon' writing was learned from the Celts, apparently of Ireland; hence C, c, in Old English, was also originally = (k): the words kin, break, broken, thick, seek, were in OE. written cyn, breccan, brocen, picc, s'oc. But during the course of the OE. period, the k-sound before e and i became palatalized, and had by the 10th c. advanced nearly or quite to the sound of (tʃ), though still written c, as in cir(i)cc, wrecc(e)a. On the continent, meanwhile, a similar phonetic change had also been going on. Original Latin C (=k) before e, i, had by palatalization advanced in Italy to the sound of (tʃ), and in France still further to that of (ts). Yet for these new sounds the old character C, c, was still retained before e and i, the letter thus acquiring two distinct values. Moreover the sound (k) also occurred in French before e and i (chiefly as a representative of Latin qu); this was now expressed in Northern French by the Greek letter K, k; so that the sound (k) had two symbols, k and c, while the symbol c had two sounds (k and ts). These French inconsistencies as to C and K were, after the Norman Conquest, applied to the writing of English, which caused a considerable re-spelling of the Old English words. Thus while OE. candel, clif, corn, crop, cit, remained unchanged, Cent, cæg (cæg), cynn, brece, s'loce, were now (without any change of sound) spelt Kent, kez, kyng, breke, seake; even cnicht was subsequently spelt kniht, knight, and pic, picc, became thik, thikk, thick. The OE. cw- was also at length (very unnecessarily) displaced by the Fr. gw, qu, so that the OE. cwén, cwic, became ME. quén, quen, quik, quik, now queen, quick. The sound (tʃ) to which OE. palatalized c had advanced, also occurred in French, chiefly (in Central French) from Latin c before a. In French it was represented by ch, as in champ, cher:-L. camp-um, cār-um; and this spelling was now introduced into English: the Hatton Gospels, written about 1160, have in Matt. i-iii, child, chylid, riche, mychel, for the cild, rice, mycel, of the OE. version whence they were copied: this was, phonetically, an improvement. In these cases, the OE. c gave place to k, qu, ch; but, on the other hand, c in its new value of (ts) came in largely in Fr. words like pro- cessium, emperice, grace, and was also substituted for ts in a few OE. words, as milste, bletsien, in early ME. milce, bleccien. By the end of the 13th c. both in France and England, this sound (ts) was reduced to simple (s); and from that date c before e, i, y, has been, phonetically, a duplicate or subsidiary letter to s; used either for 'etymological' reasons, as in lance, cent, or (in defiance of etymology) to avoid the ambiguity due to the 'etymological' use of s for (z), as in ace, mice, once, defence, defence.

Thus, on the plea of showing the etymology, we write advise, advise, instead of advize, devize, which obliges us to write advise, devise, dice, ice, mice, twice, etc., in defiance of the etymology ; bad example has extended this to hence, peuce, defence, etc., where there is no plea whatever for c. Former generations also wrote sence for sense.

Hence, in modern English, C has (1) the 'hard' sound (k) before a, o, u, before a consonant (except h), and when final, as in cab, cot, cut, claw, crow, acme, cycle, sac, tic, epic; (2) before e, i, y, it has the 'soft' sound (s). In all words from Old English or Old French, final c is avoided: the (k) sound being written k or ck, as in beak, meek, oak, book, bark, balk, bank, pack, peck, pick, rock. This is probably due to the claims of derivatives like mecker, oaken, barking, rocky, where c could not be used. Final c however is written in modern words from Latin, Greek, or other languages, and (of late) in the ending -ic, as in sac, tic, epic, critic, music, pic-nic. In the rare cases in which this c is followed in inflexion by e or i, it is necessary to change it to ch, as in physicking, mimicking, frolicking, trafficker, pic-nicker. When the (s) sound is final, it must be written -ce, as in trace, ice, thrice, and this final e must be retained in composition before a, o, u, as in trace-able, peace-able. (3) Ci (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has frequently the sound of (ʃ), esp. in the endings -cious, -cial, -cion, as atrocious, glacial, coercion (ocean). This sound (which is also taken by t in the same position) has been developed in comparatively modern times by palatalization of (s).

In a few words from foreign languages, c retains the foreign pronunciation, as in It. cicerone (tʃi[erō'ne]).

The combination CH virtually constitutes a distinct letter, having a history and sound of its own, and as such it receives a separate place in the alphabet of some languages, e.g. Spanish, Welsh. In English it is not so treated, and the CH- words are placed in Dictionaries and alphabetical lists between Ce- and Ci-. This inclusion of CH in the middle of C is one reason why the latter occupies so large a space in the Dictionary: C is virtually two letters in one, since beside the series ca-, ce-, ci-, cl-, etc., there is the parallel series cha-, che-, chi-, chl-, etc. For the history and sounds of CH, see before the beginning of the Ch- words.

6. Applied in the reign of Charles II. to the small committee or junto of the Privy Council, otherwise called the 'Committee for Foreign Affairs', which had the chief management of the course of government, and was the precursor of the modern cabinet.

b. in Hist. applied spec. to the five ministers of Charles II, who signed the Treaty of Alliance with France for war against Holland in 1672: these were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley (Earl of Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names thus arranged chanced to spell the word cabal.

This was merely a witticism referring to sense 6; in point of fact these five men did not constitute the whole 'Cabal', or Committee for Foreign Affairs; nor were they so closely united in policy as to constitute a 'cabal' in sense 5, where quot. 1670 shows that three of them belonged to one 'cabal' or clique, and two to another. The name seems to have been first given to the five ministers in the pamphlet of 1673 'England's Appeal from the private Cabal at White-hall to the Great Council of the nation... by a true lover of his country.' Modern historians often write loosely of the Buckingham-Arlington administration from the fall of Clarendon in 1667 to 1673 as the Cabal Cabinet or Cabal Ministry.

Eng.* (1864) I. 101 It happened by a whimsical coincidence that, in 1671, the Cabinet consisted of five persons the initial letters of whose names made up the word Cabal... These ministers were therefore emphatically called the Cabal; and they soon made that appellation so infamous that it has never since their time been used except as a term of reproach.

II. In politics.

7. a. As a specific use of 3: The private room in which the confidential advisers of the sovereign or chief ministers of a country meet; the council-chamber. Originally in the literal sense; now taken chiefly for what goes on or is transacted there, i.e. political consultation and action, as 'the field' is taken for 'fighting, warlike action'.

1607-12 [see 8a]. 1645 W. b. The body of persons who meet in such a cabinet; that limited number of the ministers of the sovereign or head of the state who are in a more confidential position and have, in effect, with the head of the state, the determination and administration of affairs.

Formerly called more fully the Cabinet Council, as distinguished from the Privy Council, and as meeting in the cabinet; the later abbreviation is like the use of 'the House', 'the field', for those who fill or frequent it, and would be encouraged by such expressions as 'he is of the cabinet' used of Vane by Roe, 1630. Member of the cabinet is later.

Apparently introduced, at the accession of Charles I, in 1625; but the expression cabinet council = counsel given privately or secretly in the cabinet or private apartment, occurs earlier and, from the confusion of counsel and council, was prob. a factor in the name: see Cabinet Counsellor in 9.

1607-12 BACON Counsell. Ess. (Arb.) 318 For which inconveniences the doctrine of Italy, and practice of France, [ed. 1655 in some Kings times] hath introduced Cabanett Councilles [ed. 1612 Cabanett counsels; 1625 Cabinet counsels], a remedy worse than the disease. 1623 MASSINGER *De. ## Cabbr, obs. form of CABER.

Cabish, obs. form of CABBAGE.

Cable (kæ'l-b'l), sb. Forms: 3-4 kable, 5-7 cabul(le, cabyl, -il, -ille, -el, -ell, -elle, (5-6 gable, gabyll), 3- cable. [ME. cable, cabel, kable, identical with Du. kabel, MDu. cabel, MLG. kabel, MHG. and Ger. kabel, all app. from Romanic; cf. F. câble, Sp. cable, Pg. cabre, all meaning 'cable', It. cappio sliding knot, noose, gin;—late L. capulum, capulum a halter for catching or fastening cattle, according to Isidore f. capere to take 'quod eo indomita jumenta comprehenduntur': cf. capulum, -us, 'handle, haft', capula-re to take, catch, etc.

(There are difficulties as to F. câble, older forms of which were caable, chaable, chable, chable, which point, through 'cadable', to a L. 'catabola' a kind of BALLISTA for hurling stones, etc., in which sense chaable also occurs: see Cabinus in Du Cange. Littré supposes an early confusion between this and 'cable' from Isidore's capulum; others think that as the catabola was put in motion with ropes, it may be the real source. But this does not account for the Sp. and It. words.)

1. A strong thick rope, originally of hemp or other fibre, now also of strands of iron wire.

Originally a stout rope of any thickness, but now, in nautical use, a cable (of hemp, jute, etc.) is 10 inches in circumference and upwards; ropes of less thickness being called cables or hawseers. In other than nautical use (see 2), rope is commonly used when the material is hemp or fibre (as in the 'rope' by which a train is drawn up an incline), and cable when the material is wire.

Originally a shipping term of the north of France: M. Paul Meyer rejects Littre's guess from Sp. cabo cape, headland, as if 'to sail from cape to cape', as untenable phonetically and historically, and thinks the verb must be from the name of a kind of boat. The gloss 'cabo, trabe, nave' occurs in (MS. Bibl. Nat. 1646 ff. 83 b) a 13th c. copy of an older glossary; and Littre has cabot, chabot as north French equivalents of cabot, which is still applied to a small vessel running two or three knots an hour. (Brachet guesses that caboter may be from the surname Cabot; which may have had the same origin, but cf. prec.)

Caco- representing Gr. kako- combining form of kakós bad, evil, forming many compounds in Greek, some of which, like cacochymy, cacodæmon, cacoethes, cacophony, have reached English through Latin (and French); others have been adapted directly from Greek in modern times (as cacology, cacotrophy); others have been formed on Greek analogies from their elements. Compounds of Greek and Latin, as cacodorous = malodorous, and the medical cacosomnia (sleeping badly) are exceptional. Occasionally caco- is used in looser or casual combination with words of Greek derivation, which may have been modelled on cacodæmon, as in caco-magician, cacotype. Cade (kæd), sb. 2. (a.) Also 5 kod, 5-7 cad.

[Origin and part of speech unknown. In cade lamb, 'cade' may be an adj. with some such sense as 'cast' or 'domestic, tame', or a sb. used attrib. as in pet-lamb: in the former case 'cade' as a sb. would be short for 'cade-lamb'; in the latter, 'cade-lamb' might be an expansion.]

(As Cotgrave gives an alleged F. 'cadet' a castling, a starveling, one that hath need much of cockering and pampering', a sense not unlike Eng. 'pet', it has been suggested that cade-lamb was perh. for an earlier **cadet-lamb*. But this is historically impossible. M. Paul Meyer says Cotgrave's word is not Fr., but app. the 16th c. Languedocien cadet 'little dog', and his explanation erroneous. The corresp. OF. word was chaet, cheel, which has no likeness to the ME. kod, cad, even if the sense suited. Wedgewood compares Da. kaad wanton, petulant, sportive; —ON, kad-r merry, cheerful; but cade is not at all Sc., and apparently not properly northern, since Ray 1691 explains the 'North-Country words' pet, pet-lamb as 'a cade-lamb'.)]

Cajole (kādžōw), v. Also 7 cajole, cageole, cajoul, 7-8 cajol. [a. F. cajoler, in same sense, of uncertain origin and history.

Paré c 1550 has 'cageoller comme un gay' to chatter like a jay. Littre has 16th c. examples of cajoler, cajoller, cageoller, in the senses 'to chatter like a jay or magpie', and 'to sing', also, in the modern sense 'to cajole'. Cotgr. 1611 has cajoler, cageoller 'to prattle or jangle like a jay (in a cage), to babble or prate much to little purpose'. Most etymologists taking cageoller as the original form, have inferred its derivation from cage cage, through an assumed dim. **cageole*. This is doubtful both in regard to sense and form; the early meaning 'to chatter like a jay' does not very obviously arise from cage, and does not clearly give rise to the modern sense. The Fr. dim. of cage is not **cageole* but goble 'gaul', whence F. engauler (OF. engauler, engauler, Sp. engaular) 'to put in gaul, imprison', also 'to inveigle, entice, allure, enthrall by fair words, cajole'. In Namur, cajoler has the sense engauler, to make joli, whence Grandgagnage would refer it to the stem joli. of joli, with 'prefix' ca- frequent in Walloon with an iterative 'force'. It is possible that two or even three words are here confused; in the modern sense, F. cajoler is synonymous with engauler above, and if not cognate with that word, its sense has probably at least been taken over from it by form-association of cageoler or cajoler with engauler. But the working out of the history must be left to French etymologists.]

Calamine (kæləməin). [a. F. calamine, ad. med. L. calamina, app. (like the Ger. galmei, formerly kalmee = calmia) corrupted by the alchemists from L. cadmia, Gr. καδμεία, καδμία, 'calamine'.

Agricola supposed the name to be from calamus reed, in allusion to the slender stalactitic forms common in the cadmia formacum (oxide of zinc from furnace chimneys).]

An ore of zinc: originally applied, like med. L. lapis calaminaris, and the cadmia of Pliny, to both the carbonate ZnCO<sub>3</sub> and the hydrous silicate ZnSiO<sub>3</sub>·H<sub>2</sub>O but chiefly, in France and England, to the former, which is an abundant and important English ore of zinc. The silicate, found in Carinthia, Hungary, Belgium, New Jersey, etc., is distinguished as Siliceous or Electric Calamine.

The chemical difference between the two ores was established by Smithson in 1802; in 1807 Brongniart unfortunately chose calamine as the mineralogical name of the silicate, leaving the other ore as zinc carbonate, which Beudant in 1832 named smithsonite. This nomenclature is followed by Dana. But common English and French use (see Littré) continued to apply the name calamine to the carbonate; and in conformity with this Brooke and Miller in 1852 reversed Beudant's use of calamine and smithsonite. With British mineralogists, chemists, miners, and manufacturers, calamine therefore means the carbonate.

Calamity (kælāmītī). Also 5-6 calamyte, 6-7 calamitie. [a. F. calamité, f. L. calamitat-em (nom. calamitas), damage, disaster, adversity; by Latin writers associated with calamus straw, corn-stalk, etc., in the sense of damage to crops from hail, mildew, etc. But there is difficulty in reconciling this with the force of the suffix, which etymologically could give only some such sense as 'the quality of being a calamus, reed, or straw' (cf. civitas, auctoritas, bonitas); hence some would refer it to a lost **calamis* 'injured, damaged', whence incolumis 'uninjured, sound'.

Bacon (Sylva § 669) thus fancifully etymologized the word 'Another ill accident is drouth, at the spinning of the corn, which with us is rare, but in hotter countries common; inasmuch as the word calamitas was first derived from calamus, when the corn could not get out of the stalk.'

1. To reduce to quick-lime, or to an analogous substance, by roasting or burning; 'to burn in the fire to a calx or friable substance' J.

By the alchemists and early chemists this was supposed to be to reduce a mineral or metal to its purest or most refined residuum by driving off or consuming all the more volatile and perishable constituents; in reality it yielded in most cases a metallic oxide, though sometimes only a finely comminuted or sublimed form of a metal, or a desiccated form of other substance.

A chemical element, one of the 'metals of the alkaline earths', being the basis of lime; though one of the most widely diffused of elements, it is found in nature only in composition, and was first separated by Davy in 1808, as a light yellow metal, ductile and malleable, about as hard as gold, which rapidly oxidizes in air containing moisture, and forms 'quick-lime'. Symbol Ca.

(Mahn conjectured as source L. quā librā of what weight?) Calibre and Calliper are apparently originally the same word. [Many have suggested its identity with F. callette 'foole, minnie, noddie, naturall' (Cotgr.), dim. of caille quail (estimated a silly bird); but this does not quite answer phonetically, does not quite suit the sense, and was in French applied to men as readily as to women. Others have thought of F. calotte a kind of small bonnet or cap covering only the top of the head, but no evidence appears connecting this especially with a 'callet'. Since calma in OSp. and Pg. means also 'heat of the day', Dietz, comparing mod. Pr. chaume 'resting-time of the cattle', and Rumansch calma, calma 'a shady resting-place for cattle', thought calma possibly derived from late L. calma (occurring in Psalm., Job xxx. 30), a. Gr. καύμα 'burning heat, fever heat, heat of the sun, heat of the day', used also in med. L. of the burning heat of the sun. Taken in connexion with the senses of the Rumansch and Provençal words this gives the possible development of meaning 'burning heat, heat of the day, rest during the heat of the day, quiet, stillness'; but it is notable that It. calma has no sense of 'heat', only 'a calm, or quiet fair weather' (Florio). As to the phonetic change of ax to al, Diez suggested popular assoc. with calore to be hot, calor, which Schuchardt also (Romania IV. 255) thinks probable; the latter has given other instances of the phonetic change in Vokalismus des Vulgärlateins I. 494-6 and III. 316.

Calomel (kælōmēl), Chiefly Med. Also 8 calamel. [In F. calomel, calomidas; according to Littré f. Gr. καλός fair, beautiful + μέλας black.

Littré says 'so called, it is said, because the chemist who discovered it, saw a beautiful black powder change into a white powder in the preparation.' Chambers (Cycl. 1797-51) s.v. says 'The denomination Calomel rather seems to have first belonged to the Ethiopians mineral; from καλός, autther, fair; and μέλας, niger, black: for that white or pale bodies, rubbed herewith, become black. Some will have it first given to Mercurius dulcis, by a whimsical chymist, who employed a black in his laboratory; whose complexion, as well as that of the mercury, he alluded to in the term: the medicine being fair, the operator black.' Nothing appears as to when, where, or by whom the name was given; Littré calls it 'ancien nom'.]

Mercurous chloride, or 'protochloride' of mercury (Hg<sub>2</sub> Cl<sub>2</sub>); a preparation much used in medicine in the form of a white powder with a yellow tinge, becoming grey on exposure to light; also found native as horn-quicksilver in crystals.

Calorescence (kælōresens), Physics. [f. L. calor heat; suggested by calcescence, fluorescence. (Etymologically, incorrect in form, and not expressing the fact to which it is applied.) A name applied (Jan. 1865) by Prof. Tyndall to the change of non-luminous heat-rays into rays of higher refrangibility so as to become luminous. See also CALCESCENCE.

1865 TYNDALL Heat xlii. (1870) § 617 To express this transmutation of heat rays into others of higher refrangibility, I propose the term calorescence. 1869 — Notes Lect. Light § 248 In calorescence the atoms of the refractory body are caused to vibrate more rapidly than the waves which fall upon them; the periods of the waves are quickened by their impact on the atoms. The refrangibility of the rays is, in fact, exalted. 1881 Nature XXIV. 66 Alkin gave the name of calorescence, but the term has been superseded by Tyndall's term calorescence, which is etymologically unfortunate, seeing that the Latin verb is calesco, not caloresco.

LANDELL Through Siberia I. 199 The icebergs 'calved' as they went along, with much commotion and splashing.

Calve, v. 2 dial. [Of uncertain standing and derivation. It is possible that (kāv) is merely an earlier pronunciation of calve retained locally; but it is notable that calve in coincides in form and sense with W. Flemish in-kalven (cf. de gracht knalt in 'the ditch caves in' De Bo), in which the root part is the same as in Du. af-kalven, to fall or break away, uit-kalven to fall or shoot out, said of the sides of a cutting or the like. De Vries refers this -kalven to kalve, kaluwe, surface of the ground, surface layer or soil (see CALLOW). In-kalven would thus signify the shooting in of the surface or earth above. Some, however, think that the word is, in its origin, identical with the preceding. The evidence is not decisive.

Calve (kāv, kāv) in, is the vernacular form in Lincolnshire, Norths, Hunts, Norfolk, and adjacent parts of Suffolk, Cambridge, Leicester, Derby, and Yorkshire. Wesley, who is quoted for it, was a native of Epworth, in the district covered by Mr. E. Peacock's Gloss. of Manley and Corringham, North Lincolnshire. Assuming the word to be from Dutch, it has been suggested that it was 'introduced by the Dutch navvies who came over for the large drainage works in the Lincolnshire fens' (Wedgwood).]

As originally defined, the Silurian of Murchison and Cambrian of Sedgwick, being established in different districts, were found on further investigation to overlap each other; the Cambrian is now generally held to include the Tremadoc shales, Lingula flag., Menavien beds, and Longmynd group, containing the Harlech grits and Llanberis shales; but the Geological Surveyors limit the term to the Longmynd group, while others extend it to include all the lower Silurian of Murchison (Bala and Llandello groups). 1842 H. In M.E. affected by the OF. forms (see below).

The early Teutonic name for the camel was app. in some way identical (or rather, perhaps ultimately derived from a common source) with the Gr. ἐλέphas, ἐλεφαντα, L. elephantus, elephant: viz. Gothic ribandus (=ribu), OHG. olbenta, MHG. olbent, OE. olbent, olwend, found in the Ags. Gospels, and coming down as late as Ormin in form OLFRNT, q. v. But the Lindisfarne Gloss already in the 10th c. adopted the L. of the Vulgate as camel, camell, which after the 12th c., helped by the influence of OF., became the only name. So in the other modern Teut. langs.: Ge. kamel, kamel, Du. kamel. The Romanic langs. follow two Latin types: (1) L. camēlus (like ONF. camēil, OF. chameil, later camoil, chamoil (like vila, voile, voile); (2) L. camellus, whence It. camello, Sp. camello, ONF. canel, OF. chamel, modF. chameau (like bellus, bello, bai, beast). All the OF. forms appear in M.E. where camel regularly became camayd; but the camel of OE. and ONF., being also most like the Latin, is the survivor.]

A precious stone having two layers of different colours, in the upper of which a figure is carved in relief, while the lower serves as a ground. Thence extended to all lapidary's work of the same kind; and in modern times ('by abuse' Littré says) to similar carving in shells of molluscs, of which the inner stratum is differently coloured from the outer.

[app. immediately from French: Littré cites chamelot 13th c., camelot 16th c.; Cotgr. translates F. camelot, 'chamlet'; Du Cange has med. L. camelotum; Anglo-French statutes of Edward IV have chamelett, and the spelling with cham—was the prevalent one in English till after the Restoration. The ultimate origin is obscure; at the earliest known date the word was associated (by Europeans) with camel, as if stuff made of camel's hair; but there is reason to think it was originally the Arabic khamlat, from khaml; Marco Polo (ed. Yule) I. 248 (Skeat). Khaml, khamlat, is explained by Lane as 'the nap or pile or villous substance on the surface of cloth'; khamlat, by Johnson, as 'camelot, silk and camel's hair, also, all silk or velvet, especially pily and plushy'. According to Littré, the Journal officiel of 1874, p. 3220/1, says camelot is so called from the Arabic scil el kemel, the Angora goat; cf. CAMEL-YARN.]

A name originally applied to some beautiful and costly eastern fabric, afterwards to imitations and substitutes the nature of which has changed many times over. 'A kind of stuff originally made by a mixture of silk and camel's hair; it is now made with wool and silk' (J.). 'A light stuff, formerly much used for female apparel, made of long wool, hard spun, sometimes mixed in the loom with cotton or linen yarn' (Ure). It is uncertain whether it was ever made of camel's hair; but in the 16th and 17th c. it was made of the hair of the Angora goat.

According to Beck, Draper's Dict., 'In [the] production [of camlets], the changes have been rung with all materials in nearly every possible combination; sometimes of wool, sometimes of silk, sometimes of hair, sometimes of hair with wool or silk, at others of silk and wool warp and hair woof... Those of our day have had cotton and linen introduced into their composition. They have been made plain and twilled, of single warp and weft, of double warp, and sometimes with double weft also'.

WGer. or OTent. **kampo*-s was presumably an early Germanic adoption of L. campus in its transferred sense 'field of contest or combat', also 'duel, fight, battle, war'; see CAMP sb. 2. The word was thoroughly at home in WGer., and gave origin to numerous derivatives, particularly the vb. kampjan; see KEMP v. and cf. KEMP sb. 1.—OE. centpa, WGer. kampjon = late L. campion-em CHAMPION. In ME. the word survived longest in the north, esp. as an archaism of alliterative verse.

(Kluge and other, however, claim the word as native Teutonic, mainly on the ground of the improbability that the Germans who had so many native words to designate war, should adopt a foreign designation; but they offer no satisfactory account of its etymology.)

Although camp was the Norman form of champ, no trace of it appears in ME., which had only CHAMP from central OF., in the senses of 'field of duel or tournament' and heraldic 'field'. Camp was introduced early in the 16th c., from contemporary Fr. and with the sense castra, but was also at first used to render L. campus in other senses, as well as occasionally in the sense of the earlier champ 'field of combat'.
 Littre supposed that the 16th century French use of camp was merely the literary adoption of the Picard form in a special sense; but evidently it was an adaptation of It. (or FSp.) campo, in a sense not used with F. champ.]

I. In the military sense.

1. The place where an army or body of troops is lodged in tents or other temporary means of shelter, with or without intrenchments. In common modern use the collection of tents, huts, and other equipments is the chief notion, the site being the 'camping-ground'; but as used of ancient works, Roman, British, Danish, etc., it usually means the intrenched and fortified site, within which an army lodged or defended itself; a modern intrenched camp includes both notions. The name is also given to a permanent station for the reception of troops, in order that they may be trained in manoeuvring in large bodies, and in campaigning duties generally, as the camps at Aldershot, Shorncliffe camp, camp of Chalmers.

1528 Sir G. de Cassalis, etc. (The King's Ambassadors with the Pope) in *Styrie Eccl. F. campagne country, open country, champaign, 'the field', campaign, which in the course of the 16th c. took the place of the earlier campagne in all its senses (except as the proper name of a French province). It was introduced into Eng. in the 17th c., and at first occasionally used in all the senses of the earlier CHAMPAIGN, but was at length differentiated, and restricted to the military sense, for which it is now the proper term. The forms campagna, -agnia, -ania were also in 17th c. use (see above).

Littre treats 16th c. Fr. campagne as a substitution of the northern or Picard dialect form for the Parisian champaigne; but there can be no doubt that it was actually an adaptation of It. campagna (common in the military sense in 16th c., e.g. Caro Virgil's Æn. xii. 563 'Turno la campagna aprendo', Turnus opening the campaign), and may have been taken into F. first in military phraseology, and gradually extended to other senses, the advantage of a form which could not be confounded with the name of the province Champaigne perhaps conducing to the result. 3. Mil. The continuance and operations of an army 'in the field' for a season or other definite portion of time, or while engaged in one continuous series of military operations constituting the whole, or a distinct part, of a war. (In Ger. Feldzug.)

The name arose in the earlier conditions of warfare, according to which an army remained in quarters (in towns, garrisons, fortresses, or camps) during the winter, and on the approach of summer issued forth into the open country (inella campagna, dans la campagne) or 'took the field', until the close of the season again suspended active operations. Hence the name properly signifying the 'being in the field', was also applied, now to the season or time during which the army kept the field, and now to the series of operations performed during this time. In the changed conditions of modern warfare, the season of the year is of much less importance, and a campaign has now no direct reference to time or season, but to an expedition or continuous series of operations bearing upon a distinct object, the accomplishment or abandonment of which marks its end, whether in the course of a week or two, or after one or more years. The history of the sense is seen in early Dictionaries; e.g.

1656 Blount Glossogr. s.v., A word much used among Soldiers, by whom the next Campaigne is usually taken for the next Summers Expedition of an Army, or its taking the field. 1721 Bailey, Campaign, [in Military Affairs] the

Campion<sup>2</sup> (kæmpjən). Herb. Also 7 campian, 7-8 champion. [This name appears first in Lobel (1576) and Lyte (1578) applied to the 'Rose Campion' or 'Garden Campions' (Lychnis, now Agrostemma coronaria), and the 'Wild Campions'—Red and White—(L. diurna, and vespertina). As the first was identical with the plant called by Dioscorides λυχνίς στεφανωματική, in Lat. lychnis coronaria, where the second word in both means 'of or fit for a crown, chaplet, or wreath', and the λυχνίς is said by Theophrastus to have been used for garlands, the Eng. name has been conjectured to be identical with CAMPION<sup>1</sup> and = 'champion'.
But if so, we should have looked for some such name as 'Campions' flower' 'Campions' lychnis', and also that the name should have gone back to the 14th c. when the form 'campion' for 'champion' was in Eng. use. But of neither do we find any trace, and the conjecture must for the present be taken for what it is worth. The Dict. des Sciences du Nat. (1818) tome X, has 'Compagnon Blanc, nom vulgaire Lychnis dioica'. HÉRICHÉ, Philol. de la Flore de Normandie et d'Angleterre 18, has Red and White Campion, le rouge et le blanc Compagnon, but the age of these names and their relation to campion is very doubtful. Can (kæn), v.<sup>1</sup> irreg. Forms: see below.

[A defective verb, belonging to the small but interesting group of Teutonic preterite-present verbs (now chiefly used as auxiliaries of tense, mood, or predication), in form characterized by having as their present tense an original preterite, which retains the preterite form but has come to have a present signification, and from which a new weak past tense has subsequently been developed. Cf. dare, etc. OE. cunnan, pres. Ind. cæn (cyn, pa. cilde (-cunðe), is identical with Ofris. kunna, kan, kunda (konda, OS. cunnan, can, consta, const, Du. kunnen, kan, konde), OHG. kunnan, kan, kunda (konda), or kunsta (konsta), (Ger. können, kann, konnte), ON. kunna, kann, kunna (-kunða), Goth. (and OTeut.) kunnan, kann, kunja. The OTeut. sense was 'to know, know how, be mentally or intellectually able', whence 'to be able generally, be physically able, have the power, L. posse'. Since the present was formally a preterite, its meaning 'I know' must have been derived from that of 'I have learned, I have attained to knowledge'; the original present stem being **kin-n-* or **ken-n-*, pre-Teut. **gen-n-*: cf. Lith. žinai I know, Zend ā-saī-ti knowledge, OIr. pret. adginn he knew. Beside this Teutonic has kne- (ablaut form knd-), WGer. kñā, whence OE. cniwan to know, OHG. ir-chñd-an, bi-chñd-an, to recognize, ir-chñd-i recognition (answering to a Goth. **kneþs* fem.). This stem is widely diffused in the Aryan langs.; cf. L., Gr. gnō in L. gnō-sco, Gr. γιν-σκει (-γιν-σκει); OSlav. znati to know; OIr. gnāth known. In Skr. the pres. has stem jan-, the preterite jāñ, jāñāmi, jāñāsu. It has been further thought that the root was originally related to the Aryan gn- (with by-forms gnū-, gnā-), to bring forth, produce, Skr. jānāmi, pret. jāñāmi, L., Gr. gign- (see KIN, KING); but if so, they were already differentiated in Old Aryan, and the nature of the connexion of sense has not been determined.]

Here, as in BE, it will be convenient to illustrate the inflexions separately from the senses.

III. Senses now written CON.

† 9. To get to know; to learn, study. Obs. In this sense it was also treated as a weak vb. with pa. pple. can'd: the variant con was at length established as a separate form, with weak inflexions (cons, conned): see CON v.

† 10. To can or con thank(s): to express or offer thanks, to thank; app. originally 'to acknowledge' or 'recognize' one's gratitude. [ME. thank cunne(n), OE. þanc cunnan, = þanc witan, in OS. thank witan, OHG. thank wizan. Cf. also Gr. χαρίν εὐχαρί, (L. gratias meminisse), It. saper grado, Pr. sauer grat, F. savoir gré, whence also in ME. to cunne gree, maulgre, to express one's satisfaction or displeasure. These phrases were distinctly identified with can, could as late as 1525. But on the other hand, already in M.E., the verb was often imagined to be different, and inflected as a weak vb. can or cun (whence cannes, cunne, cunnest, cunnes, cunneth, cunne) and in later times generally con (connest, cons, conne), rarely ken. See CON: the examples which follow illustrate its original form as belonging to can.]

c. 1175 Lamb. Hom. 31 Ne con crist him nenne þonc. c. 1300 Cursor M. 14065, I can hir mikel thank. c. 1400 Rom. Rose 4400, I drede thou canst me gret maugre. 1483 Caxton G. de la Tour xviii. 26 Yef he canne ani good, thanne he wille cunne her moche thanke. 1483 — Gold. Witcher. xii. xiv. 201 The smiths wyl canne them small thanks for this traier. [1672 — See CON.]

¶ The following examples show the tendency to make a separate vb. of it with regular inflexions. Some writers made it into gan, the converse of the change in CAN v. 2.

1534 More Conf. agst. Trib. II. Wks. 1210/1 Els would Christe haue canned her much more thanke. *1542 Dall. IV. ¶ Can, cannot, can be, can do, may for the nonce be used substantively in obvious senses.

† Can, v. 2 (pa. tense.) Obs. Also 4 cun, cunne, 4-5 kan, con, conne. [In M.E. and early mod. Eng. used for GAN, pa. t. of ginnan to begin: see GIN v. In the early MSS. of Cursor Mundi gan and can constantly interchange, but the evidence shows that can was fully established in northern use early in the 14th c., and its beginnings were evidently in the period before 1300, from which no northern documents survive. It was in its origin a variant of gan, apparently merely phonetic; in later times, when used as a simple auxiliary of tense, its identity with gan tended to be forgotten; it was, from its form and construction, curiously associated with the preceding verb CAN, and this occasionally led to a forgetfulness of its being a past tense, and to the substitution of couth, coude, could, the pa. t. of that verb. Can prevailed in northern and north midland poets till the 16th c., and in the end of that century it was greatly affected by Spenser and his fellow-archaists and followers. Its main function is now filled by did, though the original gan is still a favourite note of ballad poetry.]

|| Canard (kanar, kənā'id). [Fr.; lit. 'duck'; also used in sense given below.]

Littre says Canard for a silly story comes from the old expression 'vendre un canard à moitié' (to half-sell a duck), in which à moitié was subsequently suppressed. It is clear that to half-sell a duck is not to sell it at all; hence the sense 'to take in, make a fool of'. In proof of this he cites tailleur de canards, deliverer of ducks, utterer of canards, of date 1612: Cotgr., 1611, has the fuller vendeur de canards à moitié 'a coustener, guller, cogger; foister, lyer'. Others have referred the word to an absurd fabricated story purporting to illustrate the voracity of ducks, said to have gone the round of the newspapers, and to have been credited by many. As this account has been widely circulated, it is possible that it has contributed to render the word more familiar, and thus more used, in English.]

Lancashire origin. Can'le, cannle is the Sc. and northern form of candle, and the opinion has been expressed, at least since early in the 18th c., that cannel-coal is really = 'candle-coal'. It does not appear in evidence that the pronunciation of candle as can'le goes back in Lancashire to the 16th c., though such may be the case. A greater difficulty is that it is doubtful whether the original name was not simply canel, rather than cannal coal: see the first mention in Leland 1538. But no other etymological conjecture yet offered will bear examination. The following quotations refer to the derivation:

a 1734 NORTH Lives I. 294 Famous for yielding the Canal (or Candle) coal. It is so termed, as I guess, because the manufacturers in that country use no candle, but work by the light of their coal fire. 1796 KIRWAN Min. II. 52 Cannel Coal. Cannibal (kæ'nɪbəl). Forms: 6-8 canibal, 6-7 caniball, 8 caniball, 7 cannabal, 7- cannibal. [In 16th c. pl. Canibales, a. Sp. Canibales, originally one of the forms of the ethnic name Carib or Caribes, a fierce nation of the West Indies, who are recorded to have been anthropophagous, and from whom the name was subsequently extended as a descriptive term.

Professor J. H. Trumbull, of Hartford, has pointed out that i, n, r interchange dialectally in American languages, whence the variant forms Caniba, Caribe, Gallibi: and that Columbus's first representation of the name as he heard it from the Cubans was Canibales, explained as 'los de Caniba or Canima'; when he landed on Hayti, he heard the name of the people as Caribes and their country Carib; the latter was afterwards identified with Puerto Rico, named by the Spaniards 'Isla de Carib', 'which in some islands', Columbus says, 'they call Caniba, but in Hayti Carib'. Apparently, however, it was only foreigners who made a place-name out of that of the people: according to Oviedo (Hist. Gen. ii. viii.) caribe signifies 'brave and daring', with which Prof. Trumbull compares the Tupi caryba 'superior man, hero, vir'. CALIBAN is app. another variant = carib-an; cf. Gallibi above-mentioned.

Columbus's notion on hearing of Caniba was to associate the name with the Grand Khan, whose dominions he believed to be not far distant; he held 'que Caniba no es otra cosa sino la gente del Gran Can'. To connect the name with Sp. can, It. cane, L. canis dog, was a later delusion, entertained by Geraldini, Bp. of San Domingo, 1521-5; it naturally tickled the etymological fancy of the 16th c., and may have helped to perpetuate the particular form canibal in association with the sense anthropophagous. See Prof. Trumbull's article, in N. & Q. Ser. v. IV. 171.]

A passage in Burney's Hist. Music (1781) 480 suggests as an earlier meaning: 'The rule by which a composition (in canon-form), which is only partially indicated in the score, can be read out by the performers in full.' Cf. quot. 1609.

But canon reappeared in the 16th c. and is the surviving form, running together with the preceding CANON 1, so that many dictionaries treat the two as one word.]

1. Ecc. Hist. A clergyman (including clerks in minor orders) living with others in a clergy-house (claustrum), or (in later times) in one of the houses within the precinct or close of a cathedral or collegiate church, and ordering his life according to the canons or rules of the church. This practice of the canonica vita or canonical life began to prevail in the 8th c.; in the 11th c. it was, in some churches, reformed by the adoption of a rule (based upon a practice mentioned by St. Augustine) that clergymen so living together should renounce private property: those who embraced this rule were known as Augustinian (Austin) or regular, the others were secular canons.

From the 'regular' canons, came in the 12th c. those who followed the still stricter rule of Norbert of Premontré, thence called Premonstratensian Canons. These two groups of 'canons regular' were popularly distinguished by the colour of their habits as Black Canons and White Canons. As these vied, in strictness of living, with the monastic orders, the difference between a canon regular and a monk, became in the later Middle Ages (as now in the R. C. Ch.) so slight that the one is frequently confounded with the other. Thus Littré explains 'Augustinian Canons' as 'moines, dits aussi hermites de Saint-Augustin'.

2. In the Church of England, since the Reformation, all canons have been secular, and the system of canons has been retained mainly in connexion with cathedral churches, where the canons, with the dean at their head, constitute the body of resident ecclesiastical dignitaries, who manage the cathedral, and (formally) elect the bishop. (See CHAPTER.)

The name of Minor or Petty Canon is now sometimes given to those clergymen of the cathedral establishment who assist in performing the daily service, but are not members of the chapter. Honorary Canons, are titular members of the cathedral chapter, who are non-residential, and receive no emoluments. Cant (kænt), sb. 1 Also 5-8 kant. [Found c. 1400; rare before 1600. Words identical in form and corresponding in sense are found in many languages, Teutonic, Slavonic, Romanic, Celtic. Cf. Du. kant, MDu. cant, border, side, brink, edge, corner, MLG. kant (masc.) point, creek, border, also kante (fem.) side, edge, whence mod. G. kante edge, corner, border, brim, margin; also Du. and Ger. kante point-lace. (There is no trace of the word in the older stages of Teutonic.) Also OF. cant and mod. Norman cant, Walloon can side, Sp., Pg., It. canto edge, corner, side, med. L. cantus corner, side; with which some compare L. canthus, Gr. κῶνθος corner of the eye, and L. canthus tire (? fellow) of a wheel, according to Quintilian a 'barbarous' word. The Welsh cant edge of the circle, Breton kanit circle, circumference, which were thought by Diez to represent an original Celtic word, are held by Diefenbach and Thurneysen not to be native; so that at present we cannot go beyond the Romanic canto, and its possible identity with L. canthus. The Teutonic words were probably from Romanic. It is not clear whether the Eng. word was adopted from OF. or from LG., or, in different senses, from both.

Cant (kænt), sb. 2 Obs. exc. dial. [App. connected immed. with CANT v. 1 'to share', and with CANTLE, though in some uses it closely approaches CANT sb. 1; whether this is original or due to subsequent confusion is not clear.]

Cant (kænt), sb. 3 [This and its accompanying vb. presumably represent L. cantus singing, song, chant (Pr. and NFr. cant, Fr. chant), cantā-re NFr. cantier to sing, chant; but the details of the derivation and development of sense are unknown.

Cantare and its Romanic representatives were used contemptuously in reference to the church services as early as 1183, when according to Rigord (c. 1200) Gest. Philip. August. (1818) 11, the Cotarelli of the Bourges country 'sacerdotes et viros religiosos captos seculum ducentes, et irrisorie cantantes ipsos vocantes, in ipsis tormentis subsannando dicebant: Cantate nobis, cantores, cantate; et confestim dabant eis alapas, vel cum grossis virgis turpiter cedebant'. So far as the evidence shows, the vb. appears in Eng. first applied to the tones and language of beggars, 'the canting crew'; this, which according to Harman was introduced c. 1540, may have come down from the religious mendicants; or the word may have been actually made from Lat. or Romanic in the rogues' jargon of the time. The subsequent development assumed in the arrangement of the verb is quite natural, though not actually established. Some have however conjectured that cant is the Irish and Gaelic cantú (pronounced kahn'tú), or nearly kant'it 'language'. And as early as 1712 the word was asserted to be derived from the name of Andrew Cant or his son Alexander Cant, Presbyterian ministers of the 17th c. This perhaps means that the surname of the two Cants was occasionally associated derisively with canting. The arrangement of the sb. here is tentative, and founded mainly on that of the vb., which appears on the whole earlier.]

Cant (kænt), sb.<sup>4</sup> [Goes with CANT v.<sup>4</sup> The sb. (if not immediately from the vb.) may be an aphetic form of **enchant*, or **acant*, a. OF. enchant, mod.F. enchan (Pr. enchant, Sp. encanto, It. incanto), in same sense: of disputed origin. The loss of the initial syllable is found also in MHG. and mod.G. gant in same sense.

Diez takes the Romanic words as repr. L. in quantum 'to how much?' as the cry of the auctioneer; and with this agree the occas. med.L. form inguantus, Pr. enguant, and OF. inguant, and med.L. vb. inguantare. But no forms of the word appear to go back before the end of the 12th c.; the earliest and ordinary forms in med.L. were incantus (4th decl.), incantum, incantare, accantare, incantator, and OF. enchanteur, enchanteinent (already in Assises of Jerusalem). These show that the word was then identified with the Lat. incantare, accantare, derivs. of cantare to sing, in the sense of 'proclaim, cry'. Cf. Du Cange, under date 1351, 'quod incantator publicus dicti castri...debeat facere proclamationem', and the illustrative 'jussit ergo Moyses praeconis voce cantari'. M. Paul Meyer thinks the identification with cantare too old and general to be explained as an error; and that there is more ground for treating the connexion with in quantum as a later fancy. Cf. also the mod.Fr. vendre à la criée to sell by auction, and the Sc. and north. Eng. ronp, cry, shout, auction, 'selling of goods by an outcry' (Phillips 1678).

A disposal of property by public competition to the highest bidder; an auction. Chiefly Irish.

App. the same word as mod.Du. kant 'neat, clever', in phr. kant en klaar quite ready; also East Fris. kant; considered by Franck to have been developed out of the sb. kant edge, etc. (see CANT sb.<sup>1</sup>); cf. the connexion of idea in 'keen' and 'edge'. The actual historical relation between the Low German and the northern English word does not appear. Hence CANTY, Flem. and LG. kantig.]

Cantilever (kæn'tilivə). Also 7 candi-, 7-9 canti-, 8-9 cantilever, 8 cantalever, 8-9 cantalever. [The spelling cantilever found in the 17th c. (if of any authority) compared with the Sp. can debazo de la viga, mutilus super quem capita trabium imponuntur, a corbel in masonry' (Minshew Voc. Hisp. 1617), naturally suggests some such Sp. phrase as can de llevar, 'modillion for carrying or bearing'; but of this there is actually no trace. On the other hand the name 'flying lever bridge' used in A treatise on Bridge-building by T. POPE, New York, 1811, for what is now called a 'cantilever bridge', and the term 'framed lever' used for cantilever in Tredgold's Carpentry 1828, indicate that lever in its ordinary mechanical sense, is part of the word. For the first part we then think of CANT sb., but as to the meaning in which that word might be here used, or the nature of the combination in canti-lever or canta-lever, no satisfactory suggestion can be offered. (Smyth Sailor's Word-bk., has canting-livre = console-bracket.)]

1. Arch. A kind of bracket or support of stone, wood, or iron, whose length is many times its breadth and more than twice its depth, which projects from the wall of a building for the support of a balcony, the upper members of a cornice, eaves of a house, etc.; also attrib., as in cantilever cornice, principle.

The spelling canvas, with one s, plural canvases (cf. al-lases) is, it will be seen, more etymological than canvass, and now predominates; this spelling is also better used in the verb with the literal sense of 'furnish or line with canvas', whence canvassed, canvassing; but the old derivative verb with sense 'to toss in a sheet, discuss, debate, solicit votes', is now always spelt CANVASS, and this spelling is retained in the verbal sb. in turn derived from it, as 'the electoral canvass'.]

[f. CANVAS sb., in its former spelling canvass, and some of its special senses. The development of senses 1-5 is plain enough, starting from the literal notion of 'toss in a sheet', whence 'shake up, toss to and fro (agitate), discuss, etc.'; but that of the intrans. 6, which appears early, has not been explained. The two notions subsequently influenced each other, and produced connecting usages.

Johnson says: 'from canvass as it signifies a sieve': cf. CANVAS sb. 2; but no clear example of the vb. in the literal sense 'sift or winnow' has occurred. Yet Cotgrave's explanation of F. vanner 'to vanne or winnow', also to course, chide, canvass, bayt, rake up scoldingly the faults or imperfections of others, affords an analogy for such a development; not so the case of berner 'to vanne or winnow come, also to canvass or toss in a sieve (a punishment)', which points to the development in 1-4 below. With Johnson's derivation agrees his explanation 'to try votes previously to the decisive act', but this is not historically the original sense of 6, and is either a conjectural explanation, or at most a mixing up of the notions of soliciting and of discussing or investigating. The trans. sense in 'to canvass the constituency' is quite late.]

Caoutchouc (kau'tʃuk, kō-). [a. F. caoutchouc (pron. ka, u, tʃ, u), ad. Carib cauchus (Littré).] 1. India-rubber, or Gum Elastic; the milky resinous juice of certain trees in S. America, the E. Indies, and elsewhere, which coagulates on exposure to the air, and becomes highly elastic, and is waterproof; it is now a most important substance in arts and manufactures.

Introduced to France early in the last century, but its origin was unknown till the visit of the French academicians to South America in 1735. They ascertained that it was the inspissated juice of a Brazilian tree, called by the natives Ehohé; and an account of the discovery was sent to the academy by M. de la Condamine in 1736 (Penny Cycl.). Chiefly obtained from the Brazilian Siphonia elastica (Hevea caoutchouc) N.O. Euphorbiaceae, and E. Indian Ficus elastica. But many other tropical plants, Euphorbiaceae, Apocynaceae, Artocarpaceae, and others, yield it in considerable quantity. Chemically it is composed entirely of carbon and hydrogen, but is not a simple proximate principle, but a mixture of substances.

Cap (kæp), s.l. Forms: 1 (cappa), cæppe, 3 kappe, 4-6 cappe, (5 cape), 5-7 cap, 6- cap. [OE. cæppe, a. late L. cappa 'cap' (It. cappa, Fr. Sp. Pg. capa, ONF. and Picard cape, F. cape, all meaning 'cloak, cape, or cope'). Isidore, a. 636, has (XIX. xxxi. 3, De ornamentis capitis feminarum) 'cappa . . . quia capitis ornamentum est'; Diez cites cappa from a document of 660, and an ancient gloss 'cappa mitra'. Med.L. used indiscriminately cappa and capa (the latter, however, much more frequently), and commonly in the sense of 'cloak, cope'; Chron. Treverti anno 1146, has 'caracalla (i. e. a long cloak with a hood) quam nunc capam vocamus'. The presumption is that the name was transferred from a woman's cap, hood, or head-covering, as Isidore used it, to the 'hood' of a cloak, and then to a cloak or 'cape' having such a hood, and thus to a priest's 'cope'. The sense 'head-covering, cap, hat' was at an early period in Romanic appropriated by the dim. cappellum, -ellus, in It. cappello, Sp. capelo, Pr. capel, OF. capel, capel, F. chapeau, 'hat'. (The sense 'little or short cloak' was retained by the fem. dim. cappella, capella, It. cappella, Pr. Pg. capella, Sp. capilla, ONF. capelle, F. chapelle, until this received the curiously transferred sense CHAPEL, q. v.)

An explanation of cappa, from caper to take, 'quia quasi totum capiat hominem' (because it takes as it were the whole man) is erroneously cited by Du Cange, and many after him, from Isidore. It is really from Papias c 1053; and is manifestly a 'popular etymology' of a late age, after the application had passed from 'cap' to 'cloak with a hood'. (Mahn thinks that cappa may be of Iberian origin.) The evidence of OE. is important, since it points to two distinct L. types, viz. cappa (which gave cæppe, cappa, cap), and cappa which gave cæpe, cape; the latter is also witnessed by Icel. kappa 'cowled cloak, cloak with a hood': see COR.

It looks as if cappa, the living Romanic form, was first adopted in Eng. (say from Italy) in its 7th c. sense, and gave cæppe, and that at a later time cappa, so common in med.L., was introduced specially for the ecclesiastical dress. The latter is not actually evidenced in OE., but it occurs in Layamon, and was in the language early enough to undergo the phonetic change of OE. d into ME. ð. OHG. (late) had chappa 'cloak with a hood'; so MHG. kappe, MDu. cappe (both rarely in sense 'cap'); modG. kappe, Du. kap 'cap'.

Words to be distinguished are (1) Cap, OE. cæppe, L. cappa; (2) Cap, Sc. dial. form of cap (like stap, for top, dial. and Sc. as cape, cap (cf. early ME. and north. pape, Sc. pape = pope); (3) Cape, early ME. form of cape, retained in north. dial. and Sc. as cape, cap (cf. early ME. and north. pape, Sc. pape = pope); (4) Cape, mod. Eng., from F. cape, Sp. capa cloak, the same word in origin as 3, but re-introduced in a new connexion; (5) Cape, F. cap, It. capo headland; (6) Cop, OE. cop, copp top, summit, also cop; (7) Cope, early ME. cæpe, Icel. kappa, L. cappa. In ME. cape also occasionally appears for cæppe, cap.]

The Fr. cabestan is not known to us earlier than Falgry. 1530; since the word occurs in Eng. in 14th c., it may have been learned from the shipmen of Marseilles or Barcelona at the time of the Crusades. In Pg., capistrum and its derivatives have the r transposed, cabestro 'halter', nautically 'ropes, cables belonging to the bowsprit', cabrestiro 'halter-maker', cabrestante; the last is also the approved form in mod. literary Sp.; this form gave rise to the untenable conjecture that the derivation was from cabra goat + estante 'standing', ingeniously supported by the known application of the name of the goat in various languages (cabria, chevre, bock, etc.), to various mechanical devices. The attempt to find a meaning in the word, in English, produced many popular perversions of the second element, as stain, stone, stand, stall, stern, storm, string. Isidore (xvi. xxv. 10) has 'ceratum oboli pars media est, habens siliquam unam et semis'; but originally the Gr. κεράτιον was identical with the L. siliqua, and was called the siliqua Græca. (Formerly confounded with carat mark, sign, character: see sense 4.)

As a measure of weight and fineness, the carat represents the Roman siliqua, as 1/4 of the golden solidus of Constantine, which was 1/4 of an ounce: hence the various values into which 1/4 and 1/4 enter or originally entered.]

gous compound).] A generic name introduced by Kolbe c 1868 for the monatomic alcohols.

Simple Carbinol is methyl alcohol or wood spirit (taken as COH. H<sub>2</sub>), a compound of 1 atom of carbon with 2 of hydroxyl OH, and 3 of replaceable hydrogen, any one or more of which may be replaced by the same number of alcohol radicals, thename or names of which are prefixed. When only one hydrogen atom is replaced, the carbinol is a 'primary alcohol', as methyl carbinol COH.H<sub>2</sub>.CH<sub>3</sub>=ethyl or ordinary alcohol, C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>.OH; ethyl carbinol COH.H<sub>2</sub>.C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>=propyl alcohol C<sub>3</sub>H<sub>7</sub>.OH. When two atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'secondary alcohols' as dimethyl carbinol COH.H.(CH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub>=secondary propyl alcohol C<sub>3</sub>H<sub>7</sub>.O; methyl-propyl carbinol COH.H.CH<sub>3</sub>.C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>. When all three atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'tertiary alcohols', as trimethyl carbinol COH.(CH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>3</sub>=tertiary butyl alcohol C<sub>4</sub>H<sub>9</sub>.OH, dimethyl-ethyl carbinol COH.(CH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub>.C<sub>2</sub>H<sub>5</sub>. The nomenclature of the complicated members as carbinols is more simple and definite than as alcohols.

Carbinyl (kə-räinil). Chem. [f. CARBON + YL, as in ethyl, etc.] A term for the alcohol radicals of the corresponding carbinols, as Dimethyl carbinyl iodide C(CH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub>.H.I. (Watts.)

1. Chem. A salt of carbonic acid, a chemical compound formed by the union of carbonic acid with a base or basic oxide. These constitute a very numerous class of bodies, some of which, e. g. Carbonate of lime, Ca CO<sub>3</sub>, exist in great quantities in nature.

Since Carbonic acid (the hydrate), CH<sub>2</sub>O<sub>3</sub> = 2 HO.CO, contains two atoms of replaceable hydrogen, there exist two sets of carbonates, viz. Normal Carbonates in which both atoms of H are replaced by a metal, and Hydrogen Carbonates, in which only one atom of H is so replaced. Thus normal sodium carbonate (carbonate of soda) 2 Na.O.CO, hydrogen sodium carbonate (bicarbonate of soda) HO. Na.O.CO.

Hence Carcanetted a., furnished with a carcanet. 1652 BROME City Wit iv. i, Her lip painted, her neck carcanetted.

Carcass, carcase (kā'rikās), sb. Forms: a. 4 carcays, karkais, 4-6 carcass, 5 carcoys, 5-6 carcks, 5-7 carckels, -keys, -kas. b. 6 carckae, carckesse, karkaise, 6-7 carcasse, carcas, -kass, -kess, -keise, 7 -casse, -kase, -karsse, 7-8 carckass, 8 carckess, 6-carcas, 7-carcass. [Of this we have two types: a. ME. carcoys, -cays, -keis (which survived to 16th c. and even to 1611 as carkeis, -eys), a. Anglo F. carcois, carcas (in Central OF. charcas, charcois, charhois, charquois, still dial. in W. of France) answering to med.L. carcasium (see Du Cange and quot. 1450 in sense 1); b. 16th c. carcas, later carcase, carciass, a. 16th c. Fr. carcas, ad. It. carcassa (Pg. carassa, Sp. carcasa) 'carcass'. The 16-17th c. forms carckaise, -keise, -kess, are app. a mixture of a and b. In mod. spelling carcass and carcase are almost equally common: the Dictionaries from Bailey and Johnson downward give carcass alone or by preference.]

(The ulterior etymology presents many difficulties: see Diez, Littré, Scheler, Skeat. It is to be noted however that OF. carcois, med.L. carcasium, must app. be separated from OF. carquois quiver (repr. med.Gr. τερκων), evidently ad. Pers. (Arab. Turk. tarkash quiver, arrow-case), although some confusion of the two words may be suspected in mod.F. carquois (since 15th c.), It. carcasso and turcasso, Pg. carcas quiver. M. Paul Meyer thinks it must also be separated from the 17th c. F. carquois in sense 'mast-head', repr. L. caracasium. But the actual derivation of carcasium, carcas, and their mutual relation remains quite uncertain. Diez's suggestion of L. caro flesh, and It. cassa chest, breast, or cassa case, trunk, is untenable for carcasium, and not very likely for carcas.)

The Eng. word has had a parallel history; the shape and stiffness of a playing-card being generally present to mind in the later extensions of the word.]

I. 1. One of a 'pack' or set of small oblong pieces of pasteboard, used in playing games of chance, or chance and skill combined: now called more specifically playing-cards. Unless otherwise indicated by the context, always referring in this sense to the particular species of cards which are marked with 'pips' or conventional figures of four different kinds or 'suits', called severally spades, clubs, hearts, and diamonds. The 'pack' consists of 4 'suits', each of 13 cards, 10 of which bear respectively 1, 2, 3, etc. (up to 10) pips all of one form, and the remaining 3 have habited figures called 'King', 'Queen' and 'Knave', whence they are called COURT (i.e. coat) or picture-cards. (The earliest sense in Fr. and English.)

As the F. had lost the final c before the 12th c., it is not quite clear how this came into Eng. — possibly from the Latin form — it could hardly be from the Provencal. But notwithstanding these and other obscure points in the phonetic history, the derivation itself appears to be beyond doubt.]
